Volunteering and getting involved

All volunteers will receive training and support through workshop opportunities.

They will be contributing to work being carried out by the projects historians, historic landscape specialists and archaeologists.

Be involved

Whether you are an early career academic or an enthusiastic amateur, volunteering to search the archives and records or assist in field surveys is a great way to build up relevant research experience and skills.

There is little better than knowing you have contributed to the broader understanding of the world around us.

This is also an opportunity to learn new skills and meet new friends with a shared interest in heritage and history.

Get involved and stay in touch with the project

Volunteers and supporters are key for the success of the project and we want as many people as possible to be involved.

Mortimer's Cross 1461

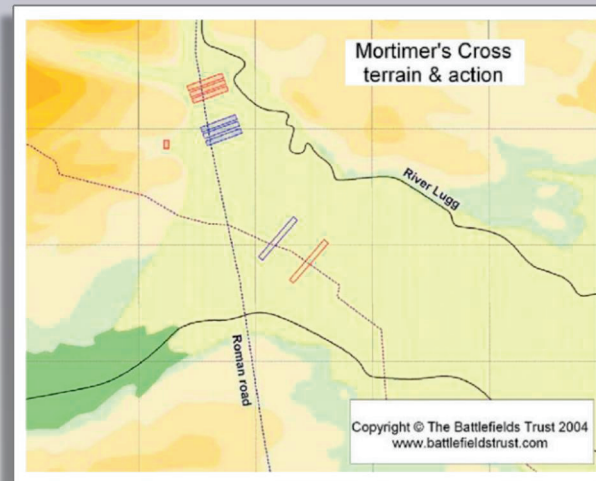

Battlefield Archaeology project

The Project will :

- Raise awareness of the wider historical importance of the battle during the Wars of the Roses
- Promote battlefield visits and enhance the experience of visitors by producing high-quality interpretation and visitor information for use on-site and on-line, using local support.
- Engage volunteers from local communities in an investigation of the battlefield and the historic landscape, local folklore and place names and reported finds, to more accurately identify the site and improve understanding.
- Provide training for volunteers from the local and the national community to fill an important gap in knowledge and skills in better managing this and future battlefield investigations.

Specifically by developing skills in battlefield and historic landscape interpretation, conservation, project design and management.

- Meet the demand for an improved understanding of the battle, the battlefield and the historic landscape amongst the local and wider community, through locally run public events, exhibitions and school activities.
- Provide information on the battlefields extent and character, to enable effective management and further supporting the case for its addition to the Battlefields Register.
